QUOTES FOR CONTEMPLATION

The blessing of God on the God-fearing man is that he sees his children’s children and peace upon the Israel of God. There is a great wonder of grace in Reformed churches where the truth of God’s covenant is known and maintained. In these churches one often sees three or more generations worshipping together and confessing together the unchanging truth of God’s wonderful salvation in Jesus Christ. Apostasy from this truth of the covenant often results in young people leaving the church already in their youth. Churches where there is such apostasy have mostly grey-headed members. The loss of the covenant youth from the church is the cause of great sorrow and anguish for aged saints who themselves have continued in the fear of the Lord. This is especially the case when God’s judgment comes on those who have passed their days in covetousness, careless about spiritual things, having little concern for the church. Their worldly lifestyle brings the chastening hand of God upon them in days of old age. Some realize this only after it is too late to do anything about it. The joy and strength of Israel is gone from many Reformed churches because of the awful apostasy and worldliness of their members.

Children who have been instructed in the truth of God and who grow up to walk in this truth are the great joy of their parents. John says, “I have no greater joy than to hear that my children walk in the truth” (III John 4). All the members of the covenant home are by grace partakers of this joy, not the least of them the aged generation in the church.

In Reformed churches where the truth of God’s covenant is maintained and known, God gives the great blessing not only of the loving care of parents for their God-given covenant children but also the joyful blessing of children caring for the aged generation among them, giving to them the honor due to them in their old age. Properly instructed covenant children show their love for God and thankfulness to Him for the heritage of the covenant they have received through their godly parents and grandparents.
